“ My father was always a very friendly guy and could strike up a conversation with anyone. He was always there and helped me become the man I am today. While he wasn't formally educated he had diverse knowledge. Often in the morning we had conversations on a wide variety of topics while he shaved. I really miss my dad and even today he is with me daily. There is so much great about me dad I couldn't really know where to begin. I wasn't always a great son but always loved him and enjoyed when we got together. He was one of the funniest men I ever met. When I was in 8th grade he wrapped me with countless bandages which allowed me to win a costume contest.

I really miss my dad. When I was growing up in a house full of people the only time we could talk one on one was when he was getting ready for work. I would talk to him about all kinds of things. It was our time to talk. He was the funniest man I new and he was a kind person. He was also stubborn . For years he was trying to quit smoking and he would hide cigarettes everywhere. It was almost like a game to find them and he would try to hide them it creative ways we couldn't find them. I will bet there are still marlboros hidden around the house.
