“ I met Chris at the very end of his life. Only three short months before the end actually. He became a very good friend to me in that time, and we bonded over one shared phrase; we got this. No matter what happened, we had it. No matter how we felt, we could make it. We spent many late nights talking about life, and where we could have ended up. He shared a lot of his regrets with me, but moreso, he shared his accomplishments, his humanity, his love.

Chris is somewhere now that the demons of his life couldn't follow him, and that in turn eases me. I wish all his loved ones and those who love him the peace that our boy finally has. I wish I could have known him more, better. I'm actually an author and would like to memorialize him in my work. If siblings or children could contact me, I would be honored in making sure our Chris is always remembered for what he was; vivacious, inspiring, and full of life.
